Does a divorce decree override a named beneficiary in Texas? This is a common question that arises during a divorce. The answer is not always straightforward, as it depends on the specific circumstances and the type of asset involved. In general, a divorce decree can override a named beneficiary designation for certain assets, but not for others. For example, a divorce decree can override a named beneficiary designation for a life insurance policy if the policy owner is the divorcing spouse. However, a divorce decree cannot override a named beneficiary designation for a qualified pension or profit-sharing plan if the plan owner is the divorcing spouse. This is because these plans are governed by federal law (ERISA), which preempts state law. In Texas, a divorce decree can override a named beneficiary designation for a non-qualified pension or profit-sharing plan. However, the divorce decree must specifically state that it overrides the named beneficiary designation. If the divorce decree does not state this, the named beneficiary designation will remain in effect. It is important to consult with an attorney to understand the implications of a divorce decree on your assets and beneficiary designations.
